At the beginning of 1987, there was a sensation in the world of palaeontology. In the centre of Italy a series of tree trunks of gigantic dimensions, found exactly as they were in life, conserved in plio-pleistocenic clay. An extraordinary event in the annals of geology. At Dunarobba, in the province of Terni, a vast land rich in clay, has managed to conserve within its protection, a slice of pure Italia.
